

“Helen, I’m a wreck...
I almost made a mistake today
that could have cost someone their life! I was so tired,
I wasn’t thinking clearly.”

“Kathy, let me guess,
another double shift?
Third time this week, right?”

End Mandatory Overtime. The life you save may be your own.

Condition Critical:

The double shift is called Mandatory Overtime — and it’s taking its toll on nurses — how long before it takes its toll on you or someone you love?

Here are the facts

- As many as 98,000 hospital patients die annually in the United States as the result of medical errors according to a report by the Institute of Medicine. New York state accounts for an estimated 6,600 of these fatal errors.
- Forcing nurses to work beyond the point of exhaustion is dangerous. Excessive overtime can impair a nurse’s judgment. A recent study found people who were awake for 19 hours or more scored substantially worse on performance tests and alertness scales than those with a blood-alcohol level of .08 — a level considered legally intoxicated in 29 states.
- Fewer mistakes would be made if nurses weren’t forced to work as many as three consecutive shifts. A recent survey shows more than 58 percent of nurses employed by New York state are mandated to work overtime on a regular basis.
- Eleven other states — California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, New Jersey, Oregon, Texas,

Washington, and West Virginia — have passed laws or regulations to limit or ban mandatory overtime.

What does it mean to me?

Nurses — who are mandated more than any other occupational category — are the most important factor in quality acute care. Providing the bulk of patient care and early warning and rapid intervention for critically-ill patients, fatigued nurses are more likely to make errors, or to miss subtle changes in the condition of patients.

What can you do?
